

Scott Nine

Moving into a more emergent and powerful future calls for courage, spirit, practice, and commitment. Scott is an eager student, playfully intense, and drawn to the intersections of spirit, justice, and governance.

Scott has recently returned to consulting after spending four and a half years launching and leading the Office of Education Innovation and Improvement at the Oregon Department of Education. He is an accomplished leader, facilitator, organizer, and strategist with a knack for operationalizing big ideas. He has a strong understanding and skillset to support the kinds of teams, culture, strategies, and communities needed to attend to the promises and dreams of young people, families, educators, legislators, and community partners. He's spent two decades organizing, writing, speaking, and learning about what it takes to foster equity for students and rewire public education systems.

Meeting the present from a big future horizon now has Scott's focus. This includes cultivating leaders of all ages who are ready to step into sacred stewardship for land, water, people and place.

Scott doesn't work alone. Teams of teams is where the action is. No one is alone. Deep change doesn't take everyone, but it starts with purpose and a crew. He's been blessed by amazing teammates and colleagues who continue to bring energy, clarity, and wisdom to the world.

Once upon a time, Scott taught middle-school English. He has a Master's degree in Social Work from Arizona State University, and has led five start-up projects of very different scales.
